Turks borrowed from the Persian knotters, the medallion appeared in the sixteenth century on these Anatolian rugs, in fact the Ottoman Empire occupied Persia during this period. , and the exchanges were numerous. The Oushak "resemble" a type of carpet painted by a Venetian painter, Lorenzo Lotto (1480 - 1557) and a German painter Hans Holbein (1497 - 1543). These are the Turkish rugs that were put on tables, balconies and hung on the walls at that time. These carpets were exported to major European hotels during the 19th century, in fact, Turkish carpets enjoyed a great reputation and were considered much better than Persian rugs and it was not until the end of the 19th century. century that Western merchants raised the coast of the Persians. Our model has remarkable shades and is in good condition considering its age, the shiny red field and its very ornate and colorful border, beautifully brings out the bronze and pink. The richness of the border makes it a real work of art, each decorative element representing a tribal symbolism deeply linked to the history and origin of these rugs but also of these populations, making each rug a unique piece. In summary, this rug is a precise example of the OUSHAK type, rich in color and in good condition for its age.

This rug has been professionally cleaned and environmentally friendly.
